Sobhraj began his criminal career at a young age, committing petty crimes and scams. He traveled extensively throughout Europe and Asia, using his charm and intelligence to gain the trust of his victims. In the mid-1970s, Sobhraj began targeting Western tourists in Thailand, Nepal, and India.

The Bikini Killer

Sobhraj earned the nickname "The Bikini Killer" after being linked to the murders of several young women who were found wearing bikinis. His victims included Teresa Knowlton and Connie Jo Bronzich, two American tourists who were found murdered in Thailand in 1975. Sobhraj was also suspected of killing a number of other tourists, but these crimes were never proven.

Sobhraj's modus operandi was to befriend his victims, gain their trust, and then drug and rob them. He would often pose as a gem dealer or a tour guide to gain access to his victims. Sobhraj was also known to use his charm and good looks to lure victims into his web.

The Serpent's Escape

Sobhraj was arrested in India in 1976 and sentenced to 12 years in prison for the murder of Bronzich. However, he escaped from prison in 1986 and fled to Nepal. Sobhraj was eventually recaptured in Nepal in 2003 and sentenced to life in prison.

Sobhraj's escape from prison was a major embarrassment for the Indian authorities. It also allowed him to continue his reign of terror for several more years. Sobhraj is believed to have killed at least 12 people, although the true number of his victims may never be known.
