The decision to align with Germany was a fateful one. In August 1940, Hitler's armies swept into Rumania, bringing with them a reign of terror that would last for four long years.

The occupation of Rumania was a brutal affair. The Nazis imposed a harsh regime of terror and exploitation, stripping the country of its resources and persecuting its Jewish population.

But the Rumanian people did not give up hope. Throughout the occupation, there were acts of resistance, both large and small. Some Romanians joined the partisans, fighting against the Nazis in the mountains. Others helped to hide Jews from the Gestapo. And still others simply refused to cooperate with the occupiers, even at great personal risk.

In the end, the Rumanian people were liberated from Nazi rule in August 1944. But the legacy of the occupation would continue to haunt the country for years to come.
